WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

Northern Region

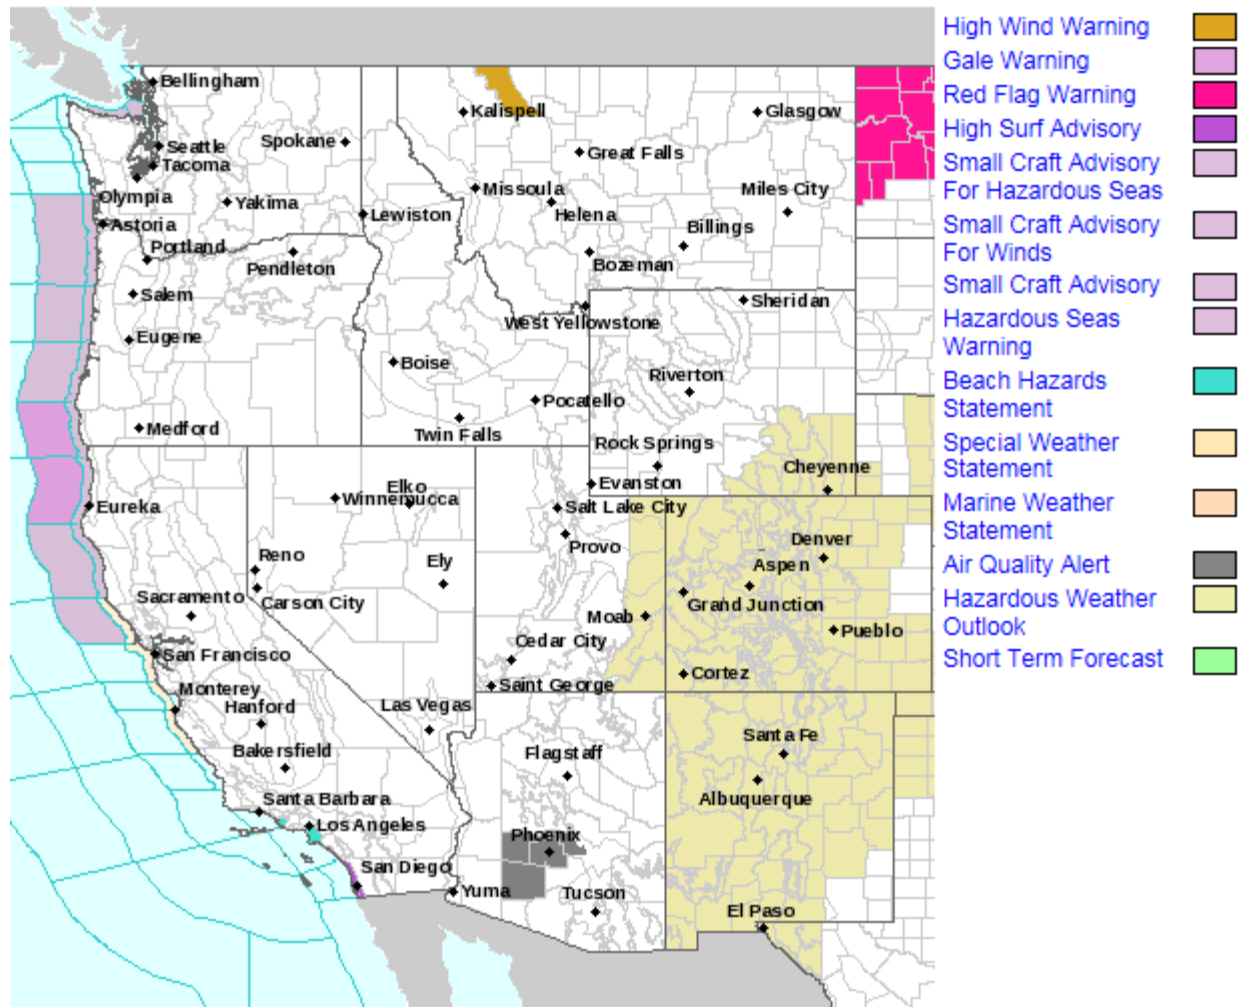

The high pressure ridge has moved off to the east and a light general southwest flow pattern has set up over the region. The northeast-east and offshore surface wind pattern will end by late this morning and winds will become slope-driven this afternoon. Areas from the Cascade-Sierra crest will see light to moderate southwest-west winds this afternoon. Also, increasing instability will lead to afternoon buildups over the mountains, and isolated showers or thunderstorms are possible near the highest peaks. This pattern will continue each day through Monday. By Tuesday a Pacific low pressure system approaching the Oregon coast will cause increasing clouds and southeast-southwest winds across mainly the northern end of the region. Cooler air will also move in. Currently, computer forecast models are showing the low slowly passing over the North Operations area beginning Wednesday with increasing rain chances and coverage.

Southern Region

An increasing onshore flow over the next few days will result in a slow cooling trend, which will begin over the weekend. But today, expect another very warm day in the valleys and lower foothills with many locations reaching the 90's. Minimum relative humidity will continue to remain in the teens for the most part. Yesterday, there were around 30 lightning discharges over Mono County and the northern Inyo National Forest. Today, lightning will mainly occur near the Sierra Crest. Expect the storms to be of short duration and remain centered near the higher terrain due to weak steering winds. This weekend into early next week, temperatures will trend downward 3-5 degrees each day. By Tuesday and Wednesday, look for widespread marine layer stratus near the coast and interior valleys. Temperatures by then will be in the 70s to lower 80s in the warmest valleys to the 60s in the mountains. West winds will increase to 20-30 mph with gusts to 45 mph each afternoon beginning Sunday across the Antelope Valley, Banning Pass eastward into the deserts. Moisture over the area will increase slightly next week, which may allow a handful of storms to develop Monday and Tuesday afternoon across the Cleveland and San Bernardino National Forest and the adjacent desert areas. The Sierras will continue to see daily rounds of isolated thunderstorms. Long range models indicate a storm system may reach Central and Northern California late next week, bringing more widespread precipitation. Temperatures will remain relatively cool through the end of next week. No strong offshore winds are expected during the next 7-10 days.
